Project Abstract

Japanese immigration to Peru began in the turn of the twentieth century and continued until the Second World War. Because of the increase in Japanese immigrants, racial conflict arose among Peruvians, which led to an organized race riot against Japanese business and homes. Out of panic from the Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor, the American government orchestrated a campaign to relocate Japanese Americans to proscribed military areas. At the expense of the U.S. government, Peru sent approximately 1,800 Japanese Peruvians to be incarcerated in segregated internment camps in the United States, while around 800 were used as exchange prisoners and repatriated to Japan. Following the end of the war, these internees were caught in a battle between two governments. The U.S. government labeled them as illegal aliens, claiming the Japanese Peruvians entered the U.S. possessing no proper documentation, passports, or visas. However, the Peruvian government did not want them back into the country. With the effort of attorney Wayne Collins, the Japanese Peruvians petitioned to return to Peru or avoid deportation and stay in the United States. Their life after camp would prove to be toughest part in the entire deportation-internment campaign. This study incorporates oral histories and archival material to explore the stories of the resettlement experience of Japanese Peruvians in the United States, Peru, and Japan.
